Graduation Project:

Study the impact of water quality on concrete properties.

The project empirically investigated the impact of mixing water quality on the properties of concrete. The water was collected of different qualities and sources from different locations in the Gaza strip. The TDS concentration in the mixing water was of arrange between 640(mg/l) to 35000(mg/l). 36 concrete cubes were produced at a ratio of 1: cement, 2: sand, 4: agg., 0.5: w/c using different TDS concentrations. The cubes were cured and crushed at 7, 14 and 28 days to measure the compressive strength. It was observed that the concrete produced with salt water had their compressive strengths gradually increased (21.64, 23.18 and 30.35) % of fresh water in (7, 14 and 28 days) respectively. In addition, the setting time is decreasing with increasing the content of TDS. The setting time of seawater decreases by about 23.07% of fresh water. It is noticed that there is no problems to mix the concrete with salt water with high TDS.
